iPad Air 2020: The best of the lot

Beautiful, powerful and compact, this fab tab beats even the top-end iPad Pro for now

MALA BHARGAVA

Every home that can afford it should have an iPad. It's the original tablet that started it all, and its unparalleled app support helps it become whatever each user wants it to be—a book, a magazine, a gaming console, a laptop to work on.

Apple has quite a big family of iPads though, and it could be a bit of a job selecting one that fits your needs; a job made somewhat more complicated by the fact that there are also variants based on storage and on connectivity for each model. But choices may just have become easier because of the huge refresh to the iPad Air 2020. For many, it's going to become the one to choose, because it's become good enough—if not better in some ways—than the iPad Pro, the top-end tablet.

Compact and comfortable

The iPad Air 2020 is a 10.9-inch tablet which somehow feels like it's just the right size. It feels compact without being at all cramped to work with. I used it with the Magic Keyboard, Apple's snazzy floating keyboard, and just sitting anywhere and resting the tablet on my knees worked out so well it freed me up to work easily in different spots of the house. When I travel light again, the Air will no doubt be the great in-between size to move around with.

The Air lives up to its name by being biscuit-thin. Minus a case, it really feels light and nice to hold. It isn't disproportionately tall, so you can actually use it both landscape and portrait-style easily, making it more versatile than tablets that are just too long to be held in the hand the way tablets first started out. The bezels on the iPad Air's display have been thinned down a lot, giving it a more 'airy' look—though they aren't as thin as they can be.

This does mean there's no home button on them. Instead, it's on the top edge, where it's combined with a fingerprint sensor for Touch ID. If you register more than one print, you easily unlock the tablet when you pick it up and turn it on. The FaceID that works on the iPad Pro isn't available here, but users aren't too bothered as they're on the inside of a mask so much more often now.

Price: ₹54,900 and ₹66,900

Pros: Powerful with the top most chip currently available from Apple, advances in design, perfect size, great build, support for Wi-Fi 6, excellent cameras, good screen and sound

Cons: Too expensive, even more so with important accessories, should have moved on to AMOLED, and a high refresh rate for the screen, bezels could be thinner, battery life is just ok

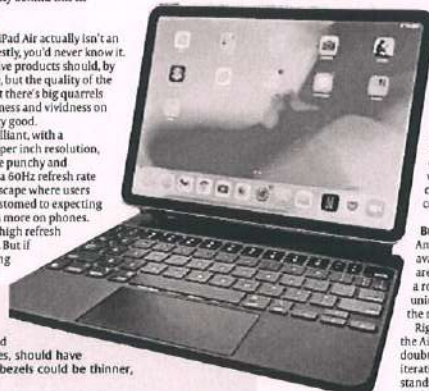

Perfect fit: The 10.9-inch iPad Air 2020 feels like it is just the right size

The Air is now more flat, like the iPad Pro and all the new iPhones, and for some reason users prefer this so much more than the overly rounded off forms that they're quite happy. Perhaps it feels more advanced—personally I, too, definitely prefer the flat box format though I'm not sure what the psychology or utility behind this is.

Bright and vivid
The screen on the iPad Air actually isn't an AMOLED, but honestly, you'd never know it. All Apple's expensive products should, by rights, be AMOLED, but the quality of the LCD is so good that there's big quarrels with it. The brightness and vividness on its screen are pretty good.

It's crisp and brilliant, with a 2360x1640 pixels per inch resolution, and the colours are punchy and pleasing. It is only a 60Hz refresh rate however, in a landscape where users have become accustomed to expecting 90-200Hz and even more on phones. The iPad Pro has a high refresh rate screen as well. But if you're not expecting it, you won't miss it.

It's a bit because performance is fast and smooth. The iPad Air now not only works with Apple's Magic Keyboard but also with the Apple Pencil. These are optional—but expensive—purchases, but important add-ons if your work or hobbies justify them. Be mindful that it isn't the first-gen Pencil that will work, but the second. Like the iPad Pro, the Air has a connector for it on the top edge in landscape mode where the Pencil just snaps on and remains in place, charging as well as sitting in readiness to be grabbed for use.

One thing that makes the iPad Air stand out from the iPad Pro and the Mini is that it now has the A14 chip (also found on the new iPhones), putting it ahead of even the iPad Pro, though that top-end also has more cores to work with and isn't slower.

The Air handles everything from image rendering to augmented reality to heavy gaming to whatever speedy thing you care to do.

Try creating music, for example. The Air also has a great set of cameras for all your video conferencing needs. It's also good to take photos if you happen to be working on it and don't have the phone handy.

Whether you can replace your laptop with the Air depends on what you do. I certainly can, but then what I do is write. If you need specific heavyweight software, that may be an issue. As a second device in addition to an existing laptop, it's certainly a wonderful luxury. For content consumption, it's also very nice, with its crisp screen and stereo sound.

Bunch of colours
Amazingly there are a bunch of colours available for the iPad Air. Colour options aren't that usual with tablets, but there is a rose gold or pinkish one, a there's a unique light green, a sky blue, silver, and the more regular space grey.

Right at the moment, many are finding the Air a better option than the iPad Pro. No doubt the Pro will be back in its next iteration, but for now the iPad Air certainly stands out from the entire collection of Apple's tablets.

Fire TV Stick gets an upgrade

Amazon's Fire TV Stick (or Firestick as it's often called) has today become a common household gadget. There have been a time when few people knew what this little gadget could do to transform the TV viewing experience by turning a TV smart, but that seems so long ago though it's just been a few years.

There are now several versions of the Fire TV Stick, including a 4K and a Lite, but the regular Fire TV Stick has also just seen an upgrade by adding support for Dolby Atmos audio and HDR. In short, a better experience—and also a faster and smoother one.

Amazon offers, there's Netflix, Sony Liv, Disney Hotstar, Discovery Plus, and you have lot more. Of course, you will be subscribed to separate channels but you will find offers for these on the Stick's interface. One that's done, navigating around is quite intuitive and self-explanatory. Using the Stick also lets you control the TV via Alexa, the smart assistant, if you have an Echo smart speaker. You can also use one or more Echo as the sound system for the TV while still retaining the use of the smart assistant for other things.

The new Fire TV Stick is available for ₹2,499 right now.

Amazon's Smart Plug: Couldn't be easier

If there's one easy way to smarten up 'dumb' devices, it's to use a smart plug and Amazon has recently launched one at ₹1,999. It's a neat looking white plug that you plug into a wall socket. Wait till it blinks and follow instructions in your Alexa app. You will be asked to scan the barcode provided in the box, so don't throw that away. The little gadget then does the rest itself, picking up your Wi-Fi connection and setting itself up, really. You can change the name later in the app depending on what device you connect to the plug.

This is a 6A plug and will work with lighter appliances such as lamps that don't have smart bulbs, table fans, and even light kettles. Of course, you need to have an Alexa speaker, and then all you need to do is command her to turn the plug on or off or even add it to a routine named according to location or mood, or even to multiple groups. This way you can voice command all sorts of appliances to get together. If the power goes off in the house (or office) the plug will return to whatever state it was left in, when it's really nice for when you're not in.

McAfee opens API, developer windows to integrate applications

OUR BUREAU
Hyderabad, November 13
Cyber security solutions firm McAfee has launched MVISION Marketplace, MVISION API (application programming interface) and MVISION Developer Portal, to allow customers to integrate its applications with security environment.

"This enables security teams to swiftly address security gaps in their architecture and improve security posture," the firm has said. The API framework will help organisations respond faster to threats, while reducing total cost of operations by automating MVISION Platform capabilities and integrating with their IT and security operations.
